

Pip woke up suddenly, she found herself somewhere dark, the hair on her arms stood up. She was terrified. Pip couldn't see much but she knew it was wet and freezing. She was in some sort of cave. Pip walked around, just outside the cave and when it got dark she went back to the cave. That night, Boom! Lightning shot the cave. Boom! Pip was scared.

Pip has eyes as sweet as puppy dog eyes, luscious hair as brown as chocolate and a nose as small as a button. She is as curious as a baby, as courageous as a warrior and as intelligent as a dolphin. She knew this wasn't Brisbane, where she lived it was summer, not a snowy winter.

Pip glanced around, she couldn't see much, but she saw paintings of colourful dragons. She sniffed and smelt the wetness of the dark, gloomy cave. It wasn't the best smelling cave but it was the only shelter she could find. She listened to the faint pitter patter of the snow outside, she was calm, but still worried. The darkness of the cave almost made her doze off but Pip couldn't fall asleep.

The next morning she was tired, but she decided to adventure more of this weird world and try to get home. Pip raced through a forest of snowy pine trees and around more caves. A few kilometres past the caves, she came across a couple of humongous igloos as she ran around a field of snow. She traveled further through the field, her legs aching terribly. She sat silently, lost in snowy blankness. She was shivering on the outside and screaming on the inside. Pip was desperate to find a friend to help her.

All of a sudden, a big mauve coloured dragon stepped in front of Pip and asked in a deep voice, "who are you?" "I'm...I'm P-P-Pip," stammered Pip, "I'm... I'm I-I-lost." Though the dragon was scary she sensed happiness in his eyes. He bent over and she climbed on the dragon. He brought her to a portal and she slipped (well basically fell) off. Pip was about to thank the dragon but he had disappeared and she walked through the portal back to her own world. Pip called out that she was home, but in response she got a "Shh! It's midnight!" from her parents. It was like time stopped since she disappeared. She filled up with happiness.

Cailin